No. 271433

Ingham Circuit Court

LC No. 06-000674-CZ

Before: Whitbeck, C.J., and Bandstra and Schuette, JJ.

PER CURIAM.

Plaintiff State News appeals as of right from the trial court order dismissing its action against defendant Michigan State University (MSU) brought under the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA).¹ The State News filed a FOIA request for a copy of a police incident report related to an assault that occurred in a dormitory on MSU's East Lansing campus. MSU denied the request under the FOIA's privacy exemption² and the law enforcement purpose exemption.³ The trial court agreed that the incident report was exempt from disclosure under these provisions and dismissed the complaint. We remand to the trial court to determine whether there are nonexempt portions of the incident report that can be separated from exempt material and released to the State News.

I. FACTS

A. The Request By The State News

On March 2, 2006, the State News requested from MSU its "police incident report" detailing an incident on February 23, 2006, involving the arrest of three men in connection with an alleged assault that occurred in Hubbard Hall, a student dormitory on MSU's East Lansing campus. Two of the assailants were non-students and the other was a student, as was one of the victims. In a story dated February 27, 2006 (which is part of the record before us), before it made its FOIA request to MSU, the State News had already identified the three arrested men as “MSU student Albert Robinson, a general business administration and pre-law freshman, and nonstudents Roy Holt and Joel Hamlar.” According to the FOIA complaint that the State News later filed with the trial court, this incident followed a shooting in the parking lot near Hubbard Hall in September 2005, and there was also a “racially motivated confrontation” at Hubbard Hall at around that time.

² MCL 15.243(1)(a).

B. The Police Incident Report

According to an affidavit that MSU’s FOIA officer, later filed with the trial court, the police incident report contained the following types of information:

a. Incident report persons sheets: These documents contain personally identifiable information about the victims, witness, responding police officers, and defendants (such as name, address, sex, race, weight, height, date of birth, driver’s license number, student number, criminal history, and other personal and sensitive information).

b. Narrative incident reports: These documents consist of statements from the responding officers, witnesses, victims, defendants, and a third party.

c. Physical evidence documents: These documents consist of photographs of evidence, property sheets, property inventory form, crime scene photographs, laboratory evidence documents, and advice of rights forms.

d. Inmate profiles/booking photographs: These documents are inmate booking sheets and inmate profile documents, including photographs.

e. CCH/LEIN information.

C. The MSU Denial

On March 24, 2006, MSU’s FOIA officer denied the State News’s FOIA request. Citing the privacy exemption and the law enforcement purpose exemption, MSU’s FOIA officer denied the request in its entirety, without any reference to MSU’s obligation under § 14(1) of FOIA⁴ to separate exempt material from nonexempt material and make the nonexempt material available for examination and copying.

D. The State News Appeal

On March 29, 2006, the State News filed an administrative appeal of the denial by way of a letter to MSU’s FOIA officer. However, this appeal was answered not by MSU’s FOIA officer but by MSU President Lou Anna K. Simon. In a letter dated April 6, 2006, President Simon determined that “the police records at issue were properly withheld.” Like MSU’s FOIA officer, President Simon made no reference to MSU’s obligation under § 14(1) of FOIA to separate exempt material from nonexempt material and make the nonexempt material available for examination and copying. We note that, according to the February 27, 2006 State News story, Robinson, Holt, and Hamlar had previously been arraigned on charges of home invasion, felonious assault, and felony firearm. Thus, at least some information about these individuals was already part of the public record. We also note, however, that the same story indicated that the Ingham County chief assistant prosecutor would not release the names of any victims.

President Simon closed her April 6 denial letter by stating:

Finally, I note that in cases where law enforcement proceedings are pending, the University must carefully weigh the applicability of Section 13(1)(b) of the FOIA so that it does not disclose information that would interfere with an ongoing criminal investigation, interfere with ongoing action by the Ingham County Prosecutor’s Office, or deprive any person of the right to a fair trial.

Counsel for the State News on May 1, 2006, wrote to President Simon to request that she reconsider her decision to withhold release of the police incident reports. However, on May 8, 2006, counsel for MSU responded by asserting, among other things, that “release of the police report does not serve the core purpose of FOIA because the report would not ‘significantly contribute’ to the public’s understanding of University operations.”

E. The State News FOIA Complaint

The State News filed its original FOIA complaint in Oakland Circuit Court on May 19, 2006. However, that court granted MSU’s change of venue motion, and, on May 31, 2006, the State News refiled its complaint in Ingham Circuit Court and moved for an order to direct MSU to show cause why it should not be ordered to comply with the State News’s FOIA request. The State News also moved for summary disposition under MCR 2.116(C)(9) and (10). At the time the complaint was filed, the preliminary examinations of two of the criminal defendants were scheduled for June 9, 2006, and the other defendant was already scheduled for trial in the Ingham Circuit Court.

F. The Trial Court Decision

The trial court held a hearing on the motion to show cause on June 8, 2006. The trial court concluded that MSU had met its burden to show that the requested records were exempt from disclosure under the privacy exemption and the law enforcement purpose exemption, and dismissed the State News’s complaint with prejudice.

The trial court noted that the incident report included the names, addresses, criminal histories, and other identifying information of the involved parties. It reasoned that the victims and witnesses were “private citizens” who were “innocently involved in something for which they could and would suffer embarrassment if their names and/or other information are divulged.” It concluded that disclosure of this personal information would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy because it “is not related to the workings of government, and would not contribute significantly to the public's understanding of the workings of government," and that MSU had shown with sufficient particularity that release of the report would interfere with law enforcement proceedings and deprive the criminal defendants of a fair trial.

The trial court refused to consider the State News's request to determine whether there was nonexempt information in the report that could be segregated from the exempt information, stating, "I can't conclude that any of this information would shed light on the functioning of government, much less contribute significantly to the public's understanding of the functioning of government." On the record before us, it is clear that the trial court did not conduct an in camera review of the police incident report. Rather, the trial court simply determined that nothing in that report should be disclosed without reviewing its contents. This appeal then ensued.

II. GENERAL MATTERS

A. The Effect Of The Passage Of Time

We note at the outset that the passage of time may have affected aspects of this appeal and that, while we can make some observations based upon the record, there are other aspects about which we can only speculate. We know from the record that before it made its FOIA request to MSU, the State News had already identified the three men arrested at Hubbard Hall. Thus, at least the names of these men and some identifying information about them were in the public domain. We know from the record that at the time President Simon issued her April 6, 2006 denial, these men had already been arraigned on charges of home invasion, felonious assault, and felony firearm. Further information about these men might therefore have been in the public domain at that time, but the record before us does not disclose what that information might be. We also know from the record that when the trial court issued its June 8, 2006 decision, one of these men had been scheduled for trial and the preliminary examinations for the remaining two were scheduled for the next day. From the record before us, however, we do not know whether trials have now been held or, if so, what the results of those trials may have been and what information might have entered into the public domain during the course of later proceedings.

Rather obviously, public bodies and trial courts can only make decisions on FOIA matters on the basis of the information that is before them at the time, and it is not the function of appellate courts to second-guess those decisions on the basis of information that later becomes available. Here, as we do not have the any information about what may have transpired after the trial court's June 8 decision, we could not engage in such second-guessing in any event. We do observe, however, that the subsequent availability of information as a result of later court proceedings in the criminal justice system may well strengthen or weaken the arguments of the parties to a FOIA dispute as to the applicability of the privacy exemption and the law enforcement purpose exemption.

As a practical matter, we suspect that this subsequent information, of which the trial court can take judicial notice on remand under appropriate procedures,⁵ will weaken MSU's position and strengthen the State News's position. But ironically, the newsworthiness of the information contained in the police incident report may also have decreased over time. However, the FOIA is not concerned with newsworthiness. Rather, it is concerned with requiring the disclosure of nonexempt public records so as to ensure accountability.

B. The Concept Of Accountability

Under the FOIA, it is the public policy of Michigan that all persons, except prisoners, "are entitled to full and complete information regarding the affairs of government and the official acts of those who represent them as public officials and public employees The people shall be informed so that they may fully participate in the democratic process."⁶

We note in this regard that the FOIA therefore is a "prodisclosure statute."⁷ We interpret its disclosure provisions broadly to allow public access, and we interpret its exceptions narrowly so that we do not undermine its disclosure provisions.⁸ Central to both the broad policy and the implementing mechanisms of the FOIA is the concept of accountability.⁹ The FOIA, through its disclosure provisions, allows the citizens of Michigan to hold public officials accountable for the decisions that those officials make on our behalf. By shifting the balance away from restricted access to open access in all but a limited number of instances, the Legislature necessarily determined that, except in those limited instances, disclosure facilitates the process of governing because it incorporates the concept of accountability.

Section 13(1)(a)¹⁰ of the FOIA states that a public body may exempt from disclosure:

Information of a personal nature if public disclosure of the information would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of an individual's privacy.

B. The Law Enforcement Purpose Exemption

Section 13(1)(b)¹¹ of the of the FOIA states that a public body may exempt from disclosure investigating records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that disclosure as a public record would do any of the following:

- (i) Interfere with law enforcement proceedings.
- (ii) Deprive a person of the right to a fair trial or impartial administrative adjudication.
- (iii) Constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.
- (iv) Disclose the identity of a confidential source, or if the record is compiled by a law enforcement agency in the course of a criminal investigation, disclose confidential information furnished only by a confidential source.
- (v) Disclose law enforcement investigative techniques or procedures.
- (vi) Endanger the life or physical safety of law enforcement personnel.

IV. STANDARD OF REVIEW

A. Levels Of Review

The Michigan Supreme Court recently clarified the standards of review that govern FOIA appeals, setting out a three-level standard of review:

First, we continue to hold that legal determinations are reviewed under a de novo standard. Second, we also hold that the clear error standard of review is appropriate in FOIA cases where a party challenges the underlying facts that support the trial court's decision. In that case, the appellate court must defer to the trial court's view of the facts unless the appellate court is left with the definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made by the trial court. Finally, when an appellate court reviews a decision committed to the trial court's discretion, such as the balancing test at issue in this case, we hold that the appellate court must review the discretionary determination for an abuse discretion and cannot disturb the trial court's decision unless it falls outside the principled range of outcomes.^[12]

¹¹ MCL 15.243(1)(b).

B. Legal Standards

Under the FOIA, a public body must disclose all public records that are not specifically exempt.¹³ To meet this burden, the public body “should provide complete particularized justification, rather than simply repeat statutory language.”¹⁴ In The Evening News Ass'n v City of Troy,¹⁵ the Michigan Supreme Court set forth the following rules that should be used in analyzing a claim of exemption from disclosure under the FOIA:

1. The burden of proof is on the party claiming exemption from disclosure.
2. Exemptions must be interpreted narrowly.
3. “[The] public body shall separate the exempt and nonexempt material and make the nonexempt material available for examination and copying.”
4. “[Detailed] affidavits describing the matters withheld” must be supplied by the agency.
5. Justification of exemption must be more than “conclusory”, i.e., simple repetition of statutory language. A bill of particulars is in order. Justification must indicate factually how a particular document, or category of documents, interferes with law enforcement proceedings.
6. The mere showing of a direct relationship between records sought and an investigation is inadequate.^[16]

V. ANALYSIS

A. Overview

¹² Herald Co v Eastern Michigan Univ Bd of Regents, 475 Mich 463, 471-472; 719 NW2d 19 (2006); see also Larry S Baker, supra at 93 (“Whether a public record falls within a statutory exemption under the FOIA is a question of law that we review de novo.”).

¹⁵ The Evening News Ass'n v City of Troy, 417 Mich 481, 503; 339 NW2d 421 (1983) (internal citations omitted).

¹⁶ Although these rules were primarily directed to the Evening News Court's analysis of the law enforcement proceedings exemption, with the exception of rule 6, we find them generally applicable to any claim of exemption from disclosure under FOIA.

In this case, the parties advocate diametrically opposing views. The State News argues that all of the records and reports in the criminal matter must be disclosed and that none of the information is private. MSU, on the other hand, would declare that even the name of a defendant after a public arraignment is personal and, therefore, private information prohibited from disclosure. We find both parties' arguments to be untenable.

B. The Law Enforcement Purpose Exemption

(1) The Arguments Of The Parties

The State News argues that the trial court erroneously concluded that the incident report was exempt under the FOIA's law enforcement purpose exemption. As noted above, this exemption in relevant part allows a public body to exempt from disclosure investigating records compiled for law enforcement purposes, but only to the extent that disclosure would interfere with law enforcement proceedings, deprive a person of the right to a fair trial, or constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy.¹⁷ The State News further argues that MSU offered only conclusory statements in support of its contention that disclosure of the police incident report would interfere with the law enforcement proceedings and jeopardize the right of the criminal defendants to a fair trial, and that the trial court erred by merely accepting these statements rather than making its own particularized findings.

Again, we note that a public body seeking to withhold information because disclosure would interfere with law enforcement proceedings must establish particularized justification for the claim.¹⁸ The public body must show how disclosure would interfere with a pending investigation by more than conclusory statements, i.e., "simple repetition of statutory language."¹⁹ Grounds for preventing disclosure in connection with an ongoing criminal investigation include fears of revealing evidence, witnesses, prospective testimony, the transactions being investigated, the direction of the investigation, governmental strategy, prospective new defendants, and the scope and limits of the government's investigation.²⁰

(2) MSU's Proposed Justification

In the affidavits that MSU presented to the trial court, there were a number of grounds asserted to support the contention that the police incident report should not be disclosed. MSU's police chief James Dunlap averred that release of the police incident report would interfere with his department's ongoing investigation by revealing witness identities and new leads, alerting potential new witnesses and prospective new defendants, and revealing the direction of the investigation. Additionally, Ingham County Assistant Prosecutor Linda Maloney asserted that the report was subject to exemption because witnesses and victims were fearful of retaliation by the defendants, and their cooperation would be negatively impacted by the release of their personal information; release of the defendants' personal information would provide an opportunity for the victims to retaliate; release of the parties' narrative statements would deprive the criminal defendants of their right to a fair trial, including disseminating inadmissible evidence to the jury pool and altering the testimony of witnesses.

(3) The Trial Court's Decision

With respect to particularized justification requirement, the trial court reasoned:

I do recognize that with respect to [the law enforcement purpose] exemption, there is a requirement of a particularized showing that it would interfere with law enforcement proceedings, or deprive a person of a fair trial. And in this Court's view there has been a particularized showing by the affidavit of the Chief Assistant Prosecutor and Chief Dunlap in that they have established that there is a potential for retaliation, of witness names and other information about witnesses to be released. There is that potential. Witnesses do not get police reports and do not have that information available to them, and to release it to the public creates the possibility of retaliation by anyone who has an interest in retaliating. Also, the name and addresses of the accused can cause potential for retaliation, and also allow inadmissible evidence to be publicly disseminated to potential jurors and also interfere with law enforcement and the administration of justice by allowing witnesses to know what other witnesses said by tainting their testimony as well as interfering with the Prosecutor's ability to assess the witness' credibility and to argue a witness' credibility effective in front of the jury.

(4) MCL 15.243(1)(b)(i) and (ii): Interference With Law Enforcement Proceedings And Deprivation Of The Right To A Fair Trial

As mentioned, MSU presented a number of grounds to support the contention that the police incident report should not be disclosed. But, primarily, the trial court relied on two interlocking assertions. The first was Maloney's assertion that disclosing the narrative statements in the police incident report "would provide an opportunity" for the criminal defendants to retaliate against the victims and vice versa. The trial court picked up on this assertion and spoke several times to the "potential" or the "possibility" of retaliation. The second assertion upon which the trial court relied was Maloney's statement that release of the police incident report would deprive the criminal defendants of their right to a fair trial. Relying on that assertion, the trial court concluded that the name and addresses of the accused can . . . allow inadmissible evidence to be publicly disseminated to potential jurors and also interfere with law enforcement and the administration of justice by allowing witnesses to know what other witnesses said by tainting their testimony as well as interfering with the

Prosecutor's ability to assess the witness' credibility and to argue a witness' credibility effective in front of the jury. [Emphasis added.]

Without more particularized reasons articulated on the record, however, the trial court's rationale is insufficient to uphold the trial court's conclusion that the entire report is exempt from disclosure.

The law enforcement purpose exemption is positive.²¹ Therefore, it was MSU's duty to show and the trial court's duty to find that the particular information that the State News wanted "would" interfere with law enforcement proceedings, deprive a person of the right to a fair trial, or constitute an unwarranted invasion of personal privacy," not merely that it "could" possibly or potentially interfere with or jeopardize the investigation.²² Witness fear of retaliation, if substantiated, can provide "a plausible reason not to reveal their testimony."²³ However, the trial court's findings fail to satisfy the requisite standard.²⁴ We therefore conclude that the trial court erred in its determination that MSU met its statutory burden to sustain its claim of exemption by failing to find with sufficient particularity that MSU specifically justified its claimed exemption.²⁵

(5) MCL 15.243(1)(b)(iii): Unwarranted Invasion Of Personal Privacy

Due to the similarities between the federal FOIA,²⁶ and the Michigan FOIA, this Court deems federal decisions persuasive in the construction of the Michigan act.²⁷ Thus, we find it significant that in Department of Justice v Reporters Comm for Freedom of Press,²⁸ the United States Supreme Court considered the scope of the federal law enforcement purpose exemption,²⁹ commonly known as "Exemption 7(C)," and held that release of a criminal record, or "rap sheet," would be a prohibited invasion of the personal privacy of the person to whom the document referred. Accordingly, to the extent that the police incident report contains names, addresses, or other identifying information of the suspects, such information may be exemptible.

(1) The Arguments Of The Parties

The State News argues that the information in the police incident report is not exempt because it is not personal in nature and its disclosure would not constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy. MSU, on the other hand, argues that involvement in a crime constitutes personal information and that disclosure is not warranted because it would not contribute significantly to public understanding of how the government operates.

(2) Interpreting The Privacy Exemption

As we noted above, under the privacy exemption, a public body may exempt from disclosure as a public record “[i]nformation of a personal nature [where the] public disclosure of the information would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of an individual’s privacy.”³⁰ Accordingly, the privacy exemption consists of two distinct elements, both of which must be satisfied for the exemption to apply. “First, the information must be of a ‘personal nature’ and, second, disclosure of the information must constitute a ‘clearly unwarranted’ invasion of privacy.”³¹ Information that is not of a personal nature is subject to disclosure without considering the second prong of the exemption.³²

Information is of a personal nature “if it reveals intimate or embarrassing details of an individual’s private life.”³³ “Whether a detail is intimate or embarrassing is evaluated in terms of the customs, mores, or ordinary views of the community.”³⁴ If a court determines that the requested information is of a personal nature, it must then determine whether disclosure of the information would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of an individual’s privacy.³⁵ To do so, the court must balance the public interest in disclosure against the interest the exemption is intended to protect.³⁶ “[T]he only relevant public interest in disclosure to be weighed in this balance is the extent to which disclosure would serve the core purpose of the FOIA, which is contributing significantly to public understanding of the operations or activities of the government.”³⁷

(3) The Trial Court’s Decision

³⁰ MCL 15.243(1)(a).

³¹ Mager v Dept of State Police, 460 Mich 134, 140; 595 NW2d 142 (1999).

³³ Mager, supra at 142, quoting Bradley, supra at 294.

³⁵ Mager, supra at 144.

³⁶ Id. at 144-145; see also Detroit Free Press, Inc v Southfield, 269 Mich App 275, 282; 713 NW2d 28 (2005).

³⁷ Mager, supra at 145 (emphasis and citation omitted).

As we stated above, the trial court, noting that the incident report included the names, addresses, criminal histories, and other identifying information of the involved parties, reasoned that the victims and witnesses were “private citizens” who were “innocently involved in something for which they could and would suffer embarrassment if their names and/or other information are divulged.” It concluded that disclosure of this personal information would constitute a clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy because it “is not related to the workings of government, and would not contribute significantly to the public’s understanding of the workings of government.”

(4) Information “Of A Personal Nature”

We agree that being a victim or witness to a crime may, at least hypothetically, be as “personal” as being involved in an automobile accident,³⁸ and people linked with a crime, whether as a perpetrator, witness, or victim, have an interest in not sharing this information with the public. Further, releasing the identity and other personal information of the parties could make them potential targets for retaliation.³⁹ Therefore, we observe that, as a hypothetical matter, the portion of the incident report containing the names, addresses, or other identifying information of the victims, witnesses, and suspects may constitute information of a personal nature. We note, however, that the passage of time and the course of events may have rendered some, if not all, of this information matters of public knowledge and therefore not of a personal nature.

Other information in the police incident report, however, such as the narrative statements and information relating to physical evidence, to the extent that they do not identify any of the private parties involved, may not be personal in nature. Therefore, this information may not be exempt under the privacy exemption.

(5) “Clearly Unwarranted” Invasions

But this does not end the inquiry. As to information that is of a personal nature, such information is exempt only if disclosure would constitute a “clearly unwarranted invasion of privacy.”⁴⁰ As stated above, the second prong of the privacy exemption requires the court to balance the public interest in disclosure against the interest the exemption is intended to protect.⁴¹ The State News argues that the police incident report would shed light on issues of public concern, such as MSU’s security policies and the government’s response to criminal activity. MSU responds that, while the police incident report might shed some light on the workings of government, its disclosure would not satisfy the requirement in Mager that disclosure contribute “significantly” to the public’s understanding of government operations.

³⁸ See Larry S Baker, supra at 95 (holding that disclosure of accident reports merely for the identification of potentially injured individuals is an unwarranted invasion of privacy).

³⁹ See Mager, supra at 143 (noting that disclosure of the names of gun owners might make them targets of theft).

As stated in Mager, the purpose of the FOIA “is not fostered by disclosure of information about private citizens that is accumulated in various governmental files but that reveals little or nothing about an agency’s own conduct.”⁴² Unlike in Mager, however, MSU has not demonstrated that the release of the police incident report would shed no light on its conduct as a public body. For example, the police incident report might shed light on campus security practices with regard to non-students or on the thoroughness of the police investigation.⁴³ And the release of the police incident report might contribute “significantly” to public understanding of how the government operates, not merely shed some light on it.⁴⁴

The police incident report is not part of the record before us. Without reading it, we cannot measure the degree to which the public interest might be served by disclosure. Further, although disclosure of personal information about the involved parties, such as names, addresses, and dates of birth, to the extent that this information is not already in the public domain, might not add to the public’s understanding of the workings of government, this exempt information, to the extent that it remains exempt, can be separated so that nonexempt portions of the report can be released. As discussed in more detail below, such separation is required by the FOIA.⁴⁵

D. In Camera Review

In Evening News, the Michigan Supreme Court set forth a three-step procedure for trial courts reviewing the denial of a FOIA request: (1) receive a complete particularized justification, or (2) conduct a hearing in camera based on de novo review to determine whether there is particularized justification for exemption, or (3) allow the plaintiff’s counsel access to the contested documents in camera.⁴⁶ Explaining this procedure, the Supreme Court said:

The objective, of course, is to secure disclosure of all pertinent information that is not exempt. If the government and the court are mutually aware of the six rules and the government is prepared to act accordingly, the matter should normally be resolved under the first step. Where the government for whatever reason is reluctant or antagonistic, or the court is in doubt, the trial court may have to proceed to the second step. If the matter is relatively clear and not too complex, the court, or the court with a master, may, within acceptable expenditure of judicial energy, be able to resolve the matter in camera. However, if the matter is not clear or simple, the court may have to consider employment of plaintiff's counsel under special agreement in order to resolve the matter.^[47]

By using the word “or,” the Supreme Court did not require a trial court to conduct an in camera review when considering the law enforcement purpose exemption. However, the Evening News Court did state that if the government is “reluctant or antagonistic, or the court is in doubt,” it may be necessary to review the requested information in camera.⁴⁸ Here, given its position at the trial level and on appeal, MSU is most certainly “reluctant or antagonistic.”

A public body is required to separate exempt and nonexempt material to the extent practicable and make the nonexempt material available to the requesting party.⁴⁹ At least some of the information in the police incident report may be nonexempt. For example, the report contains booking photographs, and this Court has held that disclosure of booking photographs does not constitute an unwarranted invasion of privacy.⁵⁰ It is of pivotal importance here that the trial court refused to review the police incident report in camera. Absent such review, the trial court self-evidently could not, for example, have engaged in the necessary balancing analysis under the “clearly unwarranted” invasion of privacy prong of the privacy exemption to weigh the public interest in disclosure against the interest the exemption is intended to protect. Under such circumstances, the trial court abused its discretion. Accordingly, we conclude that the matter should be remanded to the trial court with instructions to review the police incident report and, to the extent practicable, separate the exempt (if any currently exists) and nonexempt information and make the nonexempt information available to the State News.

VI. CONCLUSION

In sum, we conclude that:

(1) The trial court erred in its determination that the entire police incident report was exempt from disclosure under the privacy exemption.

(2) Since the application of the privacy exemption involves a balancing test, the trial court abused its discretion when it failed to review the police incident report in camera.

(3) Although the trial court may have been correct that portions of the police incident report could be withheld based on the law enforcement purpose exemption, this exemption may no longer apply to the entire report, or even any portion of it, depending on the current status of the investigation and criminal trials.

(4) On remand, the trial court shall consider, in the process of its in camera review and its subsequent decision, that the justification for applying the law enforcement purpose exemption must be more than conclusory, but, instead, that a justification must “indicate factually how a particular document, or category of documents, interferes with law enforcement proceedings.”⁵¹

(5) On remand, the trial court shall consider, in the process of its in camera review and its subsequent decision, whether any information withheld should now be made available in light of the passage of time and the current status of the investigation.⁵²

(6) On remand, the trial court shall consider, in the process of its in camera review and its subsequent decision, whether some of the identifying information in the police incident report can be redacted to protect the privacy interests of the involved parties, if necessary.⁵³

We remand for further proceedings consistent with this opinion. We do not retain jurisdiction.
