Genesee Circuit Court

LC No. 15-038244-FC

Before: BORRELLO, P.J., and M. J. KELLY and BOONSTRA, JJ.

BORRELLO, J.

The prosecution appeals by leave granted<sup>1</sup> the trial court’s opinion and order, following remand from the Michigan Supreme Court, which granted defendant’s motion to suppress statements made during a custodial interrogation without being advised of his Miranda<sup>2</sup> rights. For the reasons set forth in this opinion, we affirm.

I. BACKGROUND

This case arises out of the death of Amy Wienski, defendant’s alleged girlfriend. This matter was initially before this Court when the prosecution filed an interlocutory appeal of the trial court’s decision to grant defendant’s motion to suppress his statements, and this Court affirmed on different grounds. People v Barritt, 318 Mich App 662, 671; 899 NW2d 437 (2017), vacated in part by 501 Mich 872 (2017). The prosecution filed an application for leave to appeal this Court’s prior decision in the Michigan Supreme Court, and in lieu of granting leave to appeal, the Michigan Supreme Court vacated the holding of this Court that defendant was “in custody.” People v Barritt, 501 Mich 872; 901 NW2d 859 (2017). The Michigan Supreme Court determined that this Court properly concluded that when deciding whether defendant was “in custody,” the trial court applied the wrong legal standards. Our Supreme Court remanded the matter to the trial court for application of those standards, stating:

to determine, in light of all of the objective circumstances surrounding the interrogation: (1) whether a reasonable person would have felt that he was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave; and (2) whether the environment presented the same inherently coercive pressures as the type of station house questioning involved in [Miranda]. See Howes v Fields, 565 US 499, 509; 132 S Ct 1181; 182 L Ed 2d 17 (2012); Yarborough v Alvarado, 541 US 652, 663; 124 S Ct 2140; 158 L Ed 2d 938 (2004); People v Elliott, 494 Mich 292, 308; 833 NW2d 284 (2013). [Id.]

On remand, the trial court granted defendant's motion to exclude his statements and suppressed the evidence finding defendant was "in custody" for purposes of Miranda and pursuant to the standards set forth in the Michigan Supreme Court order. This interlocutory appeal by the prosecution followed.

On appeal, the prosecution argues that the trial court erred when it granted defendant's motion to suppress his statements because defendant was not "in custody" for purposes of Miranda, and therefore, what the prosecution describes as his voluntary, uncoerced, noncustodial statements are admissible at trial. The prosecution argues that defendant was not "in custody" for Miranda purposes because he voluntarily agreed to accompany the police in a marked vehicle to the station, he voluntarily provided information about the victim, and the room where defendant was interviewed was unlocked with people coming and going, the interview only lasted 90 minutes, and defendant was told he could stop the interview, but he continued to speak.

II. ANALYSIS

" 'The ultimate question whether a person was 'in custody' for purposes of Miranda warnings is a mixed question of fact and law, which must be answered independently by the reviewing court after review de novo of the record.' " People v Coomer, 245 Mich App 206, 219; 627 NW2d 612 (2001) (citation omitted). This Court reviews for clear error the trial court's factual findings concerning the circumstances surrounding statements to the police. Id. "A finding is clearly erroneous if, after reviewing the entire record, an appellate court is left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made." Id.

Every defendant has a constitutional right against self-incrimination. US Const, Am V; Const 1963, art 1, § 17. To effectuate this right, police must warn a defendant of his constitutional rights if the defendant is taken into custody for interrogation. People v Cortez (On Remand), 299 Mich App 679, 691; 832 NW2d 1 (2013). Statements made by a defendant to the police during a custodial interrogation are not admissible unless the defendant waives his constitutional right against self-incrimination voluntarily, knowingly, and intelligently. People v Tierney, 266 Mich App 687, 707; 703 NW2d 204 (2005).

It is undisputed that defendant was not advised of his Miranda rights when he was questioned by the detectives. The issue now before this Court is whether defendant was "in custody" for Miranda purposes, and whether the statements he made to police are inadmissible due to the lack of Miranda warnings.

The Supreme Court has stated that “custody” is a term of art that specifies circumstances that are thought generally to present a serious danger of coercion. In determining whether a person is in custody in this sense, the initial step is to ascertain whether, in light of “the objective circumstances of the interrogation,” Stansbury v California, 511 US 318, 322-323, 325, 114 S Ct 1526, 128 L Ed 2d 293 (1994), a “reasonable person [would] have felt he or she was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave.” Thompson v Keohane, 516 US 99, 112, 116 S Ct 457, 133 L. Ed. 2d 383 (1995); Fields, 565 US at 509. Further, we have been instructed by the Supreme Court that in order to determine how a suspect would have “gauge[d]” his “freedom of movement,” courts must examine “all of the circumstances surrounding the interrogation.” Stansbury, 511 US at 322, 325. The Supreme Court has listed relevant circumstances as: (1) the location of the questioning, see Maryland v Shatzer, 559 US 98, 105-106, 130 S Ct 1213, 175 L Ed 2d 1045 (2010); (2) the duration of the questioning, Berkemer v McCarty, 468 US 420, 437-438, 104 S Ct 3138, 82 L Ed 2d 317 (1984); (3) statements made during the interview, Oregon v Mathiason, 429 US 492, 495; 97 S Ct 711; 50 L Ed 2d 714; Yarborough v Alvarado, 541 US 652, 665, 124 S Ct 2140, 158 L Ed 2d 938 (2004); Stansbury, 511 US at 325; (4) the presence or absence of physical restraints during the questioning, New York v Quarles, 467 US 649, 655, 104 S Ct 2626, 81 L Ed2d 550 (1984); and (5) the release of the interviewee at the end of the questioning, California v Beheler, 463 US 1121, 1122-1123; 103 S Ct 3517, 77 L Ed2d 1275 (1983) (as quoted in Fields, 565 US at 509). All cases stress that no one circumstance is controlling, rather a reviewing Court must look to the totality of the circumstances when deciding whether an individual was subjected to custodial interrogation under Miranda. Fields, 565 US at 516. Hence, we begin our analysis by going through each of the circumstances set forth in Supreme Court case law to determine whether defendant was subjected to custodial interrogation. Fields, 565 US at 509-510.

A. LOCATION

In this case the trial court found, and the parties agreed, that defendant was questioned at a police station. From the descriptions provided by the questioning officers and from what can be gleaned from the taped interview, questioning of defendant took place in a small police office located within a larger governmental building in Homer, MI. The trial court described it as a “satellite office of the Calhoun County Sheriff’s Department.” A police station is a “police-dominated atmosphere” as contemplated by Miranda. Miranda, 384 US at 445. However, in Oregon v Mathiason, 429 US 492, 494-496, the Supreme Court reversed the Oregon Supreme Court’s finding that because defendant’s questioning had taken place in a police station, the interrogation took place in a coercive environment and defendant was therefore subjected to custodial interrogation. In Mathiason, the defendant had been suspected in a burglary. Officers attempted to make contact with defendant, eventually leaving their card and requesting that defendant call them, which he did. When defendant called, the officer asked where defendant would like to meet and after defendant, offering no preference, the officer suggested the state patrol office. Defendant met there with the officer who, on arrival, told defendant he was not under arrest, but that defendant should be truthful. Defendant confessed after being (wrongfully) told by the officer that his fingerprints were found at the scene. In reversing the Oregon Supreme Court’s finding that defendant was subjected to custodial interrogation the Supreme Court held:

In the present case, however, there is no indication that the questioning took place in a context where respondent's freedom to depart was restricted in any way. He came voluntarily to the police station, where he was immediately informed that he was not under arrest. At the close of a 1/2-hour interview respondent did in fact leave the police station without hindrance. It is clear from these facts that Mathiason was not in custody "or otherwise deprived of his freedom of action in any significant way."

Such a noncustodial situation is not converted to one in which Miranda applies simply because a reviewing court concludes that, even in the absence of any formal arrest or restraint on freedom of movement, the questioning took place in a "coercive environment." Any interview of one suspected of a crime by a police officer will have coercive aspects to it, simply by virtue of the fact that the police officer is part of a law enforcement system which may ultimately cause the suspect to be charged with a crime. But police officers are not required to administer Miranda warnings to everyone whom they question. Nor is the requirement of warnings to be imposed simply because the questioning takes place in the station house, or because the questioned person is one whom the police suspect. Miranda warnings are required only where there has been such a restriction on a person's freedom as to render him "in custody." It was that sort of coercive environment to which Miranda by its terms was made applicable, and to which it is limited. Mathiason, 429 US at 495.

In this case, the trial court acknowledged that based on Mathiason, the fact that interrogation occurred at a police station is not dispositive while also finding:

Still, the location of the questioning in the instant case weighs in favor of a finding that Defendant was in custody. Police officers have an inherent authority that generally elicits respect from the public. The average person that is summoned to a police station to talk with a detective would not feel comfortable leaving the station until the discussion was terminated by that detective. In this case, Defendant was taken to the station house in the back of a police car. He was not allowed to travel to the station with Greenway, the person Defendant had ridden with to Wienski's house despite the fact that Greenway too was driving to the station. He was then placed in a room for questioning with only police present and a police dog in close proximity. A reasonable person in that situation would not have felt comfortable leaving the station without clear permission from an officer, permission that Defendant never received.

This Court has recognized that "A person who is 'cut off from his normal life and companions,' and abruptly transported from the street into a 'police-dominated atmosphere,' may feel coerced into answering questions." Cortez, 299 Mich App at 695 (citations omitted). In Yarborough, the United States Supreme Court found that the state court reasonably determined that the defendant was not "in custody" for Miranda purposes, because the defendant was not transported to the station house by police. Yarborough, 541 US at 655.

Contrary to the facts set forth in Yarborough, here, defendant was transported to the police station by armed police officers, a fact on which the trial court placed a great deal of emphasis. The prosecution argues that this factor does not weigh in favor of finding that defendant was “in custody” because defendant agreed to speak with the police officers at a location different than Wienski’s house. According to the prosecutor, defendant arrived at Wienski’s house as the passenger in a vehicle driven by another individual, identified as Ron.<sup>3</sup> Defendant asserted that he met Ron the day before, and Ron drove defendant home in exchange for a generator. According to the prosecutor, Detective Bryan Gandy asked defendant if he would go to the police station to talk in a “better area” than on the lawn at Wienski’s home, and defendant agreed. Deputy Kevin Mahan then “had defendant take a seat” in the back of his patrol vehicle to transport defendant to the satellite office. Mahan did not force defendant into the car, or place defendant under arrest. Defendant was not handcuffed during the ride. However, as noted by the trial court, defendant was not offered the opportunity to ride with Ron to the police station. According to the prosecutor, the detectives offered defendant a ride “out of convenience,” and defendant accepted.

The prosecution further argues that, despite questioning occurring at the police station, the doors to the office where the questioning took place remained unlocked, which also weighs against a finding of custody. Gandy testified that the office doors locked from the outside, “like a school,” so an individual could exit the office freely, but entrance into the office was restricted. During the interrogation video, a knock is heard on the door behind defendant, and one of the detectives stood up, opened the door, and was seemingly handed the drink that defendant was offered. Gandy did not lock the doors once defendant was inside the office. Other people entered and exited the room freely. Defendant is seen in the video watching people enter and exit through the door located behind him. There are sounds of doors being opened and closed in the background of the interrogation video. There were two doors in the office that exited the room, and another door to an attached office. Gandy testified that defendant sat next to a door that exited the office. A door is visible in the interrogation video behind defendant and to his right, but the actual door knob is not within the camera’s frame for the entirety of the video. At one point, Gandy said that he needed to step out for a minute. In the interrogation video, a uniformed individual left through the door behind defendant, but only the back of his body from the shoulders down is visible. Presumably, this was Gandy. From the background sound of the video, it did not sound like Gandy had to use a key or badge to open the door behind defendant. Gandy returned into the interrogation room, and then Detective Hinkley stepped out.

Although there is evidence that the office doors were unlocked, this does not outweigh the fact that questioning occurred in an office at the police station, in the constant presence of armed police officers, to which defendant was escorted into by armed police officers following being transported in a marked police car. Thus, it is unlikely that a reasonable person would believe that they were free to terminate the interview and leave after being transported to the station in a marked vehicle, escorted into the building by armed police officers, questioned by armed police officers who used an increasing hostile tone. Additionally, the fact that the police knew that defendant did not have his own vehicle and insisted that he be driven in a police vehicle supports the trial court's finding that the police took defendant into custody off his front lawn.

We recognize that the facts presented in this case are certainly subject to interpretation. However, the prosecutor seems to place too great an emphasis on the subjective intent of the officers and defendant in asking us to find that the trial court clearly erred by finding that the evidence favored a finding that defendant was in custody relative to the issue of where the questioning took place. However, case law dictates that "[t]he initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned." Stansbury, 511 US at 323. This Court has made similar legal pronouncements. In People v Zahn, 234 Mich App 438, 449; 594 NW2d 120 (1999), we wrote: "The determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation rather than the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned." See also, Coomer, 245 Mich App at 219. Utilizing that standard, we cannot find that the trial court clearly erred when it found that the totality of the factors regarding the location of the questioning weighed in favor of a finding that defendant was in custody.<sup>4</sup>

B. DURATION

Gandy testified that the interview lasted approximately 90 minutes, the same amount of time as the interrogation video. The trial court determined that this was a neutral factor in making a custody determination, a finding in which we concur. The Yarborough Court determined that a two-hour interview weighed in favor of a finding of custody. Yarborough, 541 US at 665. Conversely, in Mathiason, the United States Supreme Court determined that a half-hour long interview did not constitute a custodial interrogation. Mathiason, 429 US at 495. In People v Mendez, 225 Mich App 381, 383; 571 NW2d 528 (1997), the defendant was also interviewed for 90 minutes. This Court found that the defendant was not "in custody" for Miranda purposes, but likened the facts of the case to Mathiason, because the defendant voluntarily went to the police station, was informed that he was not under arrest, and was permitted to leave at the end of the interview. Id. Lastly, in Fields, the defendant was questioned between five and seven hours, a factor which the Supreme Court, while finding lent some support to defendant's argument that Miranda's custody requirement was met, ultimately <sup>4</sup> In reaching this conclusion we reject the trial court's assertion that: "The average person that is summoned to a police station to talk with a detective would not feel comfortable leaving the station until the discussion was terminated by that detective." Here, the trial court seems to infer that questioning a suspect in a police station, by itself, can provide a legal basis for a finding that a person is "in custody." Such a conclusion runs afoul of Mathiason, and we therefore reject that portion of the trial court's analysis. Mathiason, 429 US at 494-495.

found was not controlling on the issue as to whether defendant was subjected to custodial interrogation. Fields, 565 US at 515.

C. STATEMENTS

In Yarborough, 541 US at 665, the Supreme Court held that failure to tell the suspect that he is free to leave can lead to a finding that a suspect was in custody. “Unlike the officer in Mathiason, [the officer] did not tell [defendant] he was free to leave . . . . These factors weigh in favor of the view that [defendant] was in custody.” This factor has also been acknowledged by our Chief Justice, when he wrote for the majority in Elliott, 494 Mich at 309, however finding the lack of a similar statement not pertinent to a defendant who was already incarcerated. Unlike the facts presented to our Supreme Court in Elliott, here, defendant was taken from his front lawn to the back of a patrol car and ultimately to a police station. Hence we find the issue of whether defendant was told he was free to leave relevant in our determination as to whether defendant was subjected to custodial interrogation.

Gandy did not recall telling defendant that he was free to leave. He believed that he told defendant that they could finish at any time. However, it was not until the end of the interview and after defendant stated that he needed a lawyer that Hinkley told defendant that he was not under arrest, and could finish any time. This weighs in favor of a finding of custody. Id.

In addition to finding that the police did not initially tell defendant that he was not under arrest or that he could leave at any time, the trial court also found that the increasingly accusatory nature of the interview weighs in favor of a finding of custody. See Tankleff v Senkowski, 135 F3d 235, 244 (CA 2, 1998) (holding that the officers’ increasingly hostile questioning transformed an interrogation into custodial interrogation before the defendant was advised of his Miranda rights). And, as we have pointed out before, “. . . the initial determination of custody depends on the objective circumstances of the interrogation, not on the subjective views harbored by either the interrogating officers or the person being questioned.” Stansbury, 511 US at 323. However, “an officer’s views concerning the nature of an interrogation, or beliefs concerning the potential culpability of the individual being questioned, may be one among many factors that bear upon the assessment whether that individual was in custody,” if the officer’s views were “somehow manifested to the individual under interrogation and would have affected how a reasonable person in that position would perceive his or her freedom to leave.” Stansbury, 511 US at 325.

Gandy described the interview as relaxed, and certainly in the beginning phases of the interview that appears to be an accurate description. Again, however, we note that while the subjective understandings of the police and suspect can be relevant, they are not controlling. Later in the interview, Gandy testified that there was a point in the interview where he started to feel like defendant was not telling the detectives everything that defendant knew. Hinkley asked defendant if he told them everything that he could think of, and defendant said that he did, and “[i]f there’s anything else you can think of, please ask.” Gandy remembered Hinkley saying, “no bull****,” to defendant, but asserted that this was not confrontational. The change in tone of the detectives occurred at about 53 minutes into the interview. At that point, Hinkley told defendant that he thought that defendant loved Wienski, but he did not want defendant to “bull****,” and thought something else had happened. Although Hinkley did not raise his voice, he became increasingly more aggressive toward defendant:

Detective Hinkley: . . . Whatever petty bull****, and it's probably petty bull****, we don't care, but you got to be up front with me, man.

Detective Hinkley: . . . You know that I know a lot more than what I'm saying. Okay? I do. All right? I ain't gonna bull**** ya. . . . I don't think you did anything to her. But, dude, there's some things that you're not telling me or there's some things you're not telling me accurate. All I ask of you is be straight up with me. If it's petty bull****, I don't give a f**** about it. It can go in the wind. It can go in the wind. I don't give a s***.

Hinkley asserted that the police knew that defendant was driving Wienski's car over the past few days, but defendant denied it. Hinkley said that he did not believe defendant, and the detectives had "been around the block 100 times." Hinkley also said that defendant had "been around the block" because he was "in the system," referring to defendant's criminal history.<sup>5</sup> The detectives continued to assert that defendant was being untruthful, even though he said he was "being straight up."

The Defendant: I don't have anything on my chest. That's just it. That's why I'm saying how can I help you? It's like you're trying to tell me I'm doing something or did something or know something. I don't want to do nothin' but try to help to get her back.

The detectives continued to disbelieve defendant, and asked if defendant would pass a lie detector test. Defendant said that he would pass, but would not take one because the detectives were "pointing fingers" at him. After approximately 1 hour and 14 minutes of questioning, defendant said, "Well, I think I need a lawyer now." Hinkley replied that defendant was not under arrest.

The Defendant: So, if that's the case, can we finish then?

Detective Hinkley: We can finish any time. But, what I'm saying to you is, here's the thing, you can finish any time you want. But, what I'm saying to you is . . .

The Defendant: I don't want to not finish if it's going to hurt her, but I'm not gonna continue down this path.

<sup>5</sup> Defendant told the detectives that he had been to court that day on a charge of possession of stolen property.

At this point, Detective Hinkley accused defendant of lying several times, and told defendant to “man up.” After an hour and 17 minutes, defendant said,

I don’t like where this is going, with – it looks like I’m going to have to get a lawyer, because you guys are trying to put something on me and I’m not gonna say anything that would incriminate me for anything.

We concur with the finding of the trial court that the accusatory nature of the questioning of defendant weighs in favor of a finding of custody. Tankleff, 135 F3d at 244. The detectives interrogated defendant, as they asked questions and made statements that they knew were reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. See, People v White, 493 Mich 187, 195; 828 NW2d 329 (2013). Defendant’s statements make it clear that he did not think that he was at liberty to leave. He initially asked how he could help. After defendant believed that the detectives were accusing him, he asked if they could finish. Seemingly, defendant asked the detectives if they were finished so he would get their permission to leave.

Clearly, Gandy believed defendant was a suspect prior to meeting with defendant. Although not used as a basis for the trial court’s findings, when the police first came upon defendant, they were searching Wienski’s home, where defendant stated he resided, pursuant to a search warrant. Although the record is somewhat vague as to the time outline, it does appear that prior to defendant arriving at the home, Gandy had procured a search warrant of Wienski’s home, in part, based on naming defendant as a suspect who burned her car. Hence, before Gandy met defendant, he had already identified him as a suspect, a fact which may, explain the nature and tenor of the questioning. While we acknowledge that Gandy’s beliefs are relevant “only to the extent that they would affect how a reasonable person in the position of the individual being questioned would gauge the breadth of his or her ‘freedom of action,’ ” Stansbury, 511 US at 325, we find that the accusatory tone of the questioning would lead a reasonable person to perceive that they were not free to leave until the police approved their departure from the interview. Again, while recognizing that the subjective opinions of the officers do not bear on our finding of whether defendant was “in custody,” if the officer’s views were “somehow manifested to the individual under interrogation [those views] would have affected how a reasonable person in that position would perceive his or her freedom to leave.” Stansbury, 511 US at 325.

After reviewing the facts surrounding the statements by the police and defendant in their totality, we are not left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake was made by the trial court’s finding that a reasonable person would not believe they were at liberty to terminate the interview without incident, therefore, reasonably and objectively believing themselves to be in police custody. Coomer, 245 Mich App at 219.

D. PHYSICAL RESTRAINTS

Here, there is no dispute that defendant was not initially handcuffed during the interview, and no dispute that he was handcuffed at minute 88 of the 90-minute interview for transport from the Calhoun County Sheriff’s Department satellite office to the Mount Morris Police Department. Prior to being handcuffed, defendant was never formally placed under arrest by the Calhoun County detectives. Generally, the lack of handcuffs weighs against a finding of custody. Mathiason, 429 US at 495; Yarborough, 541 US at 664, and the trial court so found. However, after making this finding, the trial court found there were other restraints present in this case. The trial court noted that defendant having to ride to the police station in the back of a patrol car, and being escorted into the police station by armed police officers were forms of restraint. Additionally, the trial court noted that defendant appeared to be in the presence of at least one armed police officer at all times. Finally, the trial court noted, after the tone of the interview became more heated officers made known to defendant that a police dog, which was present in the room, could “blow [defendant] right off [his] feet.” We examine each of these findings in order.

It is undisputed that defendant was driven to the satellite office in a police vehicle. As found by the trial court, this mode of transportation implies a physical restraint regardless of whether the prosecutor’s assertion that defendant voluntarily accepted the ride is accurate. No one unambiguously testified that defendant was “escorted” into the station. However, Mahan testified that he let defendant out of the backseat of his car at the station, and defendant “went inside the office with [the] detectives.” Gandy testified that he and Hinkley brought defendant inside. There is no indication in the record that the detectives threatened or brandished any weapons to defendant during the interview; however, Gandy testified that he and Hinkley were armed during the interview. In viewing the totality of the circumstances, riding to a police station in a marked vehicle, being walked in by armed detectives, and then being interviewed by armed police officers constituted physical restraints on defendant’s freedom of movement, and a reasonable person would not feel at liberty to terminate the conversation and leave under such circumstances.

The prosecution asserts that the presence of the canine officer and police dog did not present any restraints on defendant’s movement. Seemingly, Hinkley asked Sergeant Brad Hall<sup>6</sup> to enter the office so that he could step out to speak to Gandy. Hinkley asked defendant if he cared about the police dog entering the room, and defendant responded, “No. I like dogs.” Hall entered the room with the police dog. Defendant engaged in casual conversation with Hall regarding the police dog:

Sergeant Hall: He’s a good boy. He’s pretty friendly.

The Defendant: I bet he has his moments where he isn’t.

Sergeant Hall: Oh, he’ll blow you right off your feet if I send him.

The Defendant: Right. I bet.

Sergeant Hall: Yeah. But, no, he’s a good boy.

They continued to talk about the dog's toy, and how Sergeant Hall used the dog for tracking. However, Sergeant Hall then told defendant how important it was for defendant to tell the truth:

Sergeant Hall: So, that's why it's really important. Sometimes people go all hardcore and whatever, and they – they wait until the very last second and it kind of makes 'em look really bad. So, it's best to – best to – to, I don't know, I guess you just want to make sure that – you seem like a really nice guy. You want to make sure that you're as truthful as possible because – because you know, it's going to be rough otherwise. You see what I mean?

The Defendant: Um-hum.

Sergeant Hall: So, I don't know, that's just the only advice that I can give ya. It's always, always – it's always, always, no matter what situation you're in, it's always best to tell the truth. It's hard to stick with a lie.

After Gandy returned to the office and said that the Mount Morris Police Department wished to speak to defendant, Sergeant Hall asked defendant if there was anything else that he wanted to say after their conversation. Sergeant Hall said, "I know you got something else there. I can see it written all over your face. . . . Just got to say – say the truth. Say what happened."

Here, some context to the conversation is important to note. The statement regarding the dog being able to "blow defendant off his feet," was made in response to a question by defendant that the dog could really do some harm. After defendant made that statement, Hall told defendant that the dog would only do what he, Hall, told the dog to do. We cannot find anything from the tape or the transcripts which would lead us to conclude that the dog was placed in the room as a means of physical control over defendant. Additionally, under these limited facts, we cannot conclude that a reasonable person would believe that the dog was present in the room as a means of physical control. Accordingly, we reject the trial court's finding that the presence of the police dog imposed a physical restraint on defendant's freedom to move. Even if we were to conclude, as suggested by defendant's counsel, that the police brought the dog into the room because he was "soft on dogs," we cannot conclude that the dog in any manner imposed a restraint on defendant's freedom. However, we do find that the trial court did not clearly err in finding that other physical restraints were placed on defendant, the degree to which favors a finding that defendant was in custody.

E. RELEASE

In Mathiason, the Supreme Court used the fact that Mathiason was allowed to leave the police station at the end of the interview as one of the circumstances that led them to conclude that Mathiason had not been in custody. Mathiason, 429 US at 495. Here, at the end of defendant's interview, Gandy said that the Mount Morris Police Department wanted to talk to defendant, so at that time, Mahan handcuffed defendant, and returned defendant to Mahan's patrol car for transport. After that the following colloquy took place:

The Defendant: Am I under arrest?

Detective Gandy: We're transporting you to another department and that's going to be up to them. But, we can't transport you without being restrained, for safety reasons.

The Defendant: He said yeah, so I am being arrested?

Unidentified Speaker [Deputy Mahan]: I didn't say yeah.

The Defendant: I thought you said yeah.

Unidentified Speaker [Deputy Mahan]: I didn't say nothin'<sup>7</sup>.

The prosecution argues that this factor weighs against a finding of custody because defendant was not arrested by the sheriff's department that conducted the interview. However, the prosecutor also asserts that at the time of the handcuffs being placed on defendant, he was in custody for purposes of Miranda.<sup>8</sup> Defendant was not released upon termination of the questioning, but rather, was placed in handcuffs and transported to another police department. Because defendant was not released at the end of questioning, this factor weighs in favor of a finding of custody. Yarborough, 541 US at 664-665; Mathiason, 429 US at 495.

Given the totality of the circumstances surrounding the above-referenced factors, and this Court's review for clear error of the trial court's factual findings concerning the circumstances surrounding statements to the police, we are not left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made relative to the trial court's factual findings. Coomer, 245 Mich App at 219. Further, relative to the issue of whether defendant was in custody at the time of his interrogation, based on our review of the totality of the circumstances we concur with the trial court that a reasonable person in defendant's position would not have felt free to terminate the interview and leave. Fields, 565 US at 509; Cortez, 299 Mich App at 691. Accordingly, defendant was in "custody" at the time of his interrogation.

II. COERCIVE ENVIRONMENT

As our Supreme Court and the United States Supreme Court have stated, determining whether an individual's freedom of movement was curtailed is the first step in the analysis, not the last. Elliott, 494 Mich 292, 308; Fields, 565 US at 509. This point is best illustrated by the Supreme Court's ruling in Berkemer v McCarty, supra. In Berkemer, the Supreme Court held that the roadside questioning of a motorist who was pulled over in a routine traffic stop did not constitute custodial interrogation. 468 US at 423, 441-442. The Supreme Court held that "a traffic stop significantly curtails the ‘freedom of action’ of the driver and the passengers,” and that it is generally “a crime either to ignore a policeman’s signal to stop one’s car or, once having stopped, to drive away without permission.” 486 U.S., at 436; Fields, 565 US at 510. “[F]ew motorists, would feel free either to disobey a directive to pull over or to leave the scene of a traffic stop without being told they might do so.” Id. Nevertheless, the Supreme Court held that a person detained as a result of a traffic stop is not in Miranda custody because such detention does not “sufficiently impair [the detained person’s] free exercise of his privilege against self-incrimination to require that he be warned of his constitutional rights.” 468 US at 437. Hence, the temporary and what the Supreme Court characterized as “relatively nonthreatening” detention that follows a Terry<sup>9</sup> stop was insufficient for a finding of custody under Miranda. Id. What follows then is the idea that not all restraints on an individual’s freedom of movement are tantamount to custody for purposes of deciding whether a person has been subjected to custodial interrogation under Miranda. The often-quoted statement from Berkemer makes the point: [the Supreme Court] ha[s] “decline[d] to accord talismanic power” to the freedom-of-movement inquiry. Berkemer, 468 US at 437. In all such cases, a reviewing Court must ask the additional question whether the relevant environment presents the same inherently coercive pressures as the type of station house questioning at issue in Miranda. Fields, 565 US at 509.

<sup>7</sup> Our review of the audio recording leads us to believe that someone said "yeah" in response to defendant's question of whether he was under arrest.

<sup>8</sup> Presuming an issue exists relative to whether defendant invoked his right to counsel, that issue was outside the scope of remand and was not considered by the trial court. Consequently, there is no record that would permit our review of the issue. Accordingly, we express no opinion as to whether, or when, defendant exercised his right for the presence of counsel.

On remand, our Supreme Court instructed the trial court to consider its decision in People v Elliott, 494 Mich 292; People v Barritt, 501 Mich 872. In Elliott, our Chief Justice, writing for the majority, concluded that the defendant was not “in custody” for Miranda purposes. Elliott, 494 Mich at 295. Elliott was incarcerated for a parole violation, and was taken to the jail library by a deputy to be questioned by a parole officer for 15 to 25 minutes. Id. at 299, 308. Elliott was not physically restrained. Id. at 308. Elliott was never told that he was free to leave the meeting and return to his jail cell. Id. at 309. Based on these facts, as well as other considerations, our Chief Justice concluded that the inherently coercive pressures present in Miranda were not present in Elliott. Id. at 311. Elliott was not questioned for an extended time by armed police officers using a sharp tone and profanity; rather, the parole officer visited Elliott as part of her job. Id. at 311-312. Elliott did not indicate that he did not want to speak to the parole officer. Id. at 312. Thus, Chief Justice MARKMAN concluded that these circumstances were “hardly the sort of incommunicado, police-dominated atmosphere involving custodial interrogation and the ‘overbearing’ of the subject’s will toward which Miranda was directed.” Id. at 313.

We acknowledge that Gandy testified that, in his opinion, the police did not coerce defendant to talk. In fact, throughout the beginning of the interrogation video, defendant maintains a relaxed tone and posture, often laughing throughout the conversation. He lightheartedly told a story about Wienski’s mom thinking that he stole one of her spoons on Thanksgiving. Defendant was asked what he wanted to drink, and he jokingly responded, “Beer. Coke.” However, the subjective opinions of the officer aside, the facts as a whole demonstrate that the environment presented, what the trial court correctly labeled as “the same inherently coercive pressures as those present during the station house questioning in Miranda.” Unlike

Elliott who was incarcerated, from the time the officers saw defendant at Wienski's home, he was always in the company of at least one armed officer. Defendant was on his front lawn when he was told by police to get into the back of a police car. His dog had been forcibly removed from the home by animal control officers. He had no idea where the dog had been taken or how he would be able to secure the dog's return. He was not able to drive to the police station in the same car that brought him to the house, despite the fact that the police had told defendant's driver to drive to the very same police station. When the police car stopped, testimony indicated that armed detectives led defendant from the police car into the police station. Also from the testimony of the officers and review of the video, we conclude that there was never a time when defendant was not being watched by an armed police officer. Defendant did not get to arrange the time of the interview, the place of the interview or when the interview would conclude. Rather, defendant was told when he was being interviewed, where he was being interviewed, and the tenor of the interview. At the end of the interview defendant was handcuffed and placed in another police vehicle. In sum, defendant was never "free" to any significant degree. Rather, his freedom of movement, along with his choices, had been taken from him by police officers from the time he was told to get into the back of the patrol vehicle.

Hence, this is not a case where the defendant was already in police custody, or incarcerated or where the defendant was allowed by police to schedule a time or place for the interview or even select the mode of transportation to the interview. As alluded to in Elliott, it is difficult to imagine a setting other than prison where an individual's freedom of movement is more controlled by outside factors. Defendant was not initially told he could leave or terminate the interview. Within a short time of being told he could end the interview at any time, defendant was handcuffed and placed inside another police vehicle for transportation to a different police station. The interview became increasingly accusatory as the detectives asserted that defendant was lying, and did not tell them everything that he knew. The detectives asked defendant if he would pass a lie detector test, a statement indicative of psychological intimidation. An additional canine officer entered the room, and again appealed to defendant's sense of honesty, and encouraged him to tell the truth. Taken together, these facts indicate a coercive environment. "Fidelity to the doctrine announced in Miranda requires that it be enforced strictly, but only in those types of situations in which the concerns that powered the decision are implicated." Berkemer, 468 US at 437. Ultimately, it becomes apparent that this case is the type of situation that compels Miranda warnings be given.

Accordingly, we conclude that the trial court did not clearly err in finding that a reasonable person in defendant's position would have felt that he was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave, and the environment presented the same coercive pressures as the type of station house questioning in Miranda. Therefore, defendant was "in custody," and his Fifth Amendment rights were violated when he was not advised of his Miranda rights.

Affirmed.

PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MICHIGAN,

Plaintiff-Appellee,

v

JOHN EDWARD BARRITT,

Defendant-Appellant.

FOR PUBLICATION

No. 341984

Genesee Circuit Court

LC No. 15-038244-FC

Before: BORRELLO, P.J., and M. J. KELLY and BOONSTRA, JJ.

BOONSTRA, J. (dissenting).

I respectfully dissent. I conclude from my review of the record that, considering the totality of the circumstances, People v Coomer, 245 Mich App 206, 219; 627 NW2d 612 (2001), defendant was not in “custody” at the time of his interrogation. Therefore, I am left with a definite and firm conviction that a mistake has been made, id., and would reverse the trial court’s order granting defendant’s motion to suppress.

As the majority notes, our Supreme Court vacated this Court’s prior holding that defendant was in custody, and remanded the matter to the trial court to determine, in light of all of the objective circumstances surrounding the interrogation: (1) whether a reasonable person would have felt that he was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave; and (2) whether the environment presented the same inherently coercive pressures as the type of station house questioning involved in Miranda v Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 86 S.Ct. 1602, 16 L.Ed.2d 694 (1966). See Howes v Fields, 565 U.S. 499, 509; 132 S.Ct. 1181; 182 L.Ed.2d 17 (2012); Yarborough v Alvarado, 541 U.S. 652, 663; 124 S.Ct. 2140; 158 L.Ed.2d 938 (2004); People v Elliott, 494 Mich. 292, 308; 833 N.W.2d 284 (2013). [People v Barritt, 501 Mich 872; 901 NW2d 859 (2017).]

On remand, the trial court again found defendant to have been in custody, and the majority affirms. I agree with much of what the majority gleans from the record, and I agree that certain factors tend to favor a finding that defendant was in custody while other factors tend to favor a finding that defendant was not in custody. But I disagree with certain of the trial court’s descriptions and characterizations (some of which are adopted by the majority), and this ultimately compels me to reach a different conclusion.

For example, and as the majority accurately notes, with respect to the “location of the questioning” factor, defendant agreed to speak with police officers at the police station rather than in the yard of his missing girlfriend’s home; defendant was transported to the station, unrestrained, in the backseat of a police vehicle. Moreover, the prosecution indicated that detectives offered defendant a ride “out of convenience” and that he accepted. However, the trial court stressed not only that defendant “was not given the opportunity” to ride with Greenway,<sup>1</sup> but even more significantly, that defendant “was not allowed to travel to the station with Greenway” (emphasis added). In my judgment, this verbiage pejoratively suggests—without support in the record—that police officers denied a request by defendant to travel to the station with Greenway. What the record instead indicates is that officers offered defendant a ride, and he accepted the offer—nothing more, nothing less. Defendant did not have a vehicle of his own, and he did not even know Greenway. Defendant also could have reasonably believed that a ride with Greenway would not have been free of charge. Defendant had just met Greenway the day before, and knew him as someone who drove people places for money—or in defendant’s case, for a generator. I therefore glean little from the mere fact that defendant traveled to the station with the officers. The trial court further pejoratively characterized defendant’s arrival at the police station—again without support in the record—as having been “removed from the car and escorted into the station by armed officers.” Defendant was not, however, forcibly dragged from the police vehicle at gunpoint; to the contrary, after accepting the officers’ offer of a ride, he then exited the vehicle upon arrival and accompanied them into the building. Again, nothing more, nothing less.

The trial court additionally acknowledged that the subsequent interview took place in an unlocked room (which, as the majority notes, had multiple doors from which people entered and exited freely), and that defendant’s freedom of movement within the room was not restrained in any way. The majority properly discounts the balance of the trial court’s analysis of this factor. Specifically, it rejected the trial court’s suggestion that a police dog was used to intimidate defendant; to the contrary, the record reflects that defendant was a lover of dogs, that the dog became a subject of friendly conversation, and that defendant had a positive interaction with the dog. The majority also states:

[W]e reject the trial court’s assertion that: “The average person that is summoned to a police station to talk with a detective would not feel comfortable leaving the station until the discussion was terminated by that detective.” Here, the trial court seems to infer that questioning a suspect in a police station, by itself, can provide a legal basis for a finding that a person is “in custody.” Such a conclusion runs afoul of [Oregon v Mathiason, 429 US 492, 97 S Ct 711, 50 L Ed 2d 714 (1977)], and we therefore reject that portion of the trial court’s analysis. Mathiason, 429 US at 494-495.

I conclude that, absent the taint left by the trial court's pejorative characterizations, there is little left of the "location of the questioning" factor that would weigh in favor of a finding of custody, except for that which the majority has itself rejected.

With regard to the duration of the questioning, the trial court purported to conclude that the 90-minute duration of the interview "does not weigh heavily in either direction," a finding with which the majority concurs. However, the trial court qualified its finding by stating as follows: "What this Court does find concerning about the duration of Defendant's questioning is that it persisted after Defendant twice mentioned a need for an attorney and requested that the interview end."<sup>2</sup> For reasons that I will elaborate upon later, this statement does not, in my judgment, accurately characterize the circumstances or the record. But the fact that the trial court found this "concerning about the duration of [the] questioning" suggests to me that the trial court did not in fact weigh the duration factor neutrally.

With regard to the supposedly inculpatory statements made during the interview,<sup>3</sup> I note that I am unable to discern from either the transcript or the video of the interview that defendant confessed to anything or even made a material admission, leaving me wondering whether this is much ado about nothing. I also must place the interview in context. At the time of defendant's interview, it had not been determined that any crime had been committed. To the contrary, the Calhoun County Sheriff's Department conducted a wellness check at the Calhoun County home of defendant's girlfriend, Amy Wienski, after her vehicle was discovered burned and abandoned in Genesee County. Although officers suspected foul play and executed a search warrant at the home, the fate and whereabouts of Wienski were then unknown. While officers were present at the home, defendant (who also lived there) arrived in a vehicle driven by Greenway. Defendant and the officers began conversing in the yard of the home and, as noted, defendant agreed to continue that conversation at the police station. People v Barritt, 318 Mich App 662, 665-670; 899 NW2d 437 (2017), vacated in part by 501 Mich 872 (2017) (footnotes omitted).

The trial court acknowledged that defendant was never told during the interview that he was not free to leave, and that he was told—albeit late in the interview—that he was not under arrest and that the interview could end at any time. However, the trial court stated:

The transcript of the interview suggests that the initial questioning was not confrontational. However, as the interview progressed, the hostility in the room quickly escalated as the detectives repeatedly accused Defendant of being untruthful and demanded he change his statement.

<sup>2</sup> The majority similarly characterizes defendant as having "stated that he needed a lawyer." The majority does not, however, conclude or suggest that defendant unequivocally asserted or was denied his right to counsel.

<sup>3</sup> Except as noted, the officers present during the interview were Detective Steve Hinkley and Detective Bryan Gandy, although each of them stepped out of the interview room at times.

The trial court additionally described the interview as becoming “heated” and referred to “the aggressive nature of the questioning.” Not exactly.

It is noteworthy in my mind that the trial court made its judgment about the interview based solely on the transcript of the interview, and that the trial court opted not to view the video of the interview. The trial court thus denied itself the benefit of the full flavor of the interview, inasmuch as the written transcript does not reflect such factors as tone, volume, atmosphere, and inflection. In my judgment, the failure to view the video of the interview contributed to the trial court errantly describing the actual nature of the interview.

The video of the interview demonstrates that for in excess of 53 minutes of its 90-minute duration (equating to 56 pages of a 90-page transcript), the discussion between defendant and the officers was entirely casual, conversational, and even friendly. They discussed such topics as dogs, cars, Wienski’s animals (including a coatimundi, a baby mouse, and raccoons), ticks, insulation, and online dating sites, and defendant jokingly responded, “Beer. Coke.,” when asked what he would like to drink. Defendant repeatedly expressed a desire to help the officers. At the 53:20 mark (page 55) of the interview, defendant stated that he had told the officers everything he could think of, and told Detective Hinkley that “If there’s anything else you [Detective Hinkley] can think of, please ask.” (Emphases added). Detective Hinkley then expressed the view that defendant loved Wienski but that something had happened to her, and that he believed that defendant had some idea about what had happened. Hinkley later indicated at approximately the 59 minute mark (page 63) of the interview that he had reason to believe that defendant had driven Wienski’s vehicle that weekend and that defendant was not being truthful about whether he had driven the vehicle. But even then the tone and tenor of the conversation remained calm, measured, and at times so soft-spoken that it was difficult to hear on the recording of the interview.<sup>4</sup> It was not aggressive in tone, hostile, demanding, or accusatory of a crime. Rather, officers expressed a belief that defendant had not done anything purposefully to harm Wienski, but that perhaps something had happened accidentally and that defendant knew something about what had happened.

As noted, the trial court also indicated that defendant twice “requested a lawyer,” and that he “requested that the interview end,” but that officers instead “continued to question Defendant” and to “accuse Defendant of lying.” The inaccuracy of that description is best revealed, I think, by quoting from the transcript of the interview beginning at the 74:34 minute mark (page 79 of the 90-page transcript):

MR. BARRITT: Well, I think I need a lawyer now. You guys are trying to . . .

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: You’re not under arrest or anything. You’re not under arrest.

MR. BARRITT: Well, then why am I here then? I told you everything.

<sup>4</sup> Even when officers used profanity, they did so in a soft-spoken and conversational manner, not in an in-your-face or confrontational manner.

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: Yeah, you're not under arrest for anything.

MR. BARRITT: So, if that's the case, we can finish then?

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: We can finish any time. But what I'm saying to you is, here's the thing, you can finish any time you want. But, what I'm saying to you is . . .

MR. BARRITT: I don't want to not finish it if it's going to hurt her, but I'm not gonna continue down this path.

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: Well, here's the deal. You did something? Either you did something to her or an accident happened to her. That's what all this comes down to. It's an accident or you did it on purpose. Okay? I don't think you did it on purpose. I'm pretty sure you didn't do it on purpose because I'm pretty good at reading people. Okay? So, you're in the car, so you're lying about the car. You're lying about the car. Lying, lying, lying. Okay. That's just it, period. Okay? I mean, I know enough, I'm so positive about that, I will call you a liar to your face, and I don't do that to people. Okay? You lied, lied, lied. Okay? So, that means to me either you did something on purpose to her or something accidentally happened to her. Okay? Now, this is a real simple choice for you. Okay? All right? This is an accident or it's on purpose. Okay? You - you got to man up sometime in your life. You've got to man up and you've got to come to some type of reasonable situation from this. Something happened. You know it happened. I know it happened. I know you're lying about the car, dude. I know you're lying about the car. I - you're lying about the car, dude. I mean, I'd frickin' put my paycheck - I know you're lying about the car. Okay? So, that makes me - that troubles me about her. I don't think you did it on purpose. I think it was an accident. All right, dude? I'm - I'm telling you, I'm pretty sure it was an accident. All right. You know it was an accident. I know it was an accident. What happened to her?

MR. BARRITT: I don't know.

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: You do know.

MR. BARRITT: I don't know.

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: You definitely know.

MR. BARRITT: No, I don't.

DETECTIVE GANDY: John . . .

DETECTIVE HINKLEY: Just a second. I got to . . .

DETECTIVE GANDY: All right.

MR. BARRITT: I don't like where this is going, with - it looks like I'm going to have to get a lawyer, because you guys are trying to put something on me and I'm not gonna say anything that would incriminate me for anything.<sup>5</sup>

DETECTIVE GANDY: Okay. (Talking on phone) . . .

[Emphases added.]

The next approximately 7 minutes of the interview (and 4 pages of the transcript) consist not of continued questioning but of delays (filled with silence or side conversations) and casual discussion between defendant and Sergeant Brad Hall<sup>6</sup> relating to the police dog and defendant's dog. Eventually, the following exchange occurred:

SERGEANT BRAD: Yeah. Well, sometimes you got to get the other thing taken out. I mean, dogs are pretty important, make sure they're safe. But, probably the most important thing here is that - that we get this taken care of. Right?

MR. BARRITT: Well, yeah, absolutely. I did my part.

SERGEANT BRAD: Yeah. Well, so, you been helping those guys out pretty good?

MR. BARRITT : Yeah. As best I can.

SERGEANT BRAD: They're pretty good guys. I'll tell you what, if - if anybody can find her, they can. So, you know, they work hard and do a really good job. So, they're working - working for her and doing the best they can to find her and to straighten these things out. So, I been here for a lot of these kind of things. Never in charge - I'm not in charge of nothing. I just stand around, do things, sit here with you while they - while they, you know, discuss other information and things that might've come in, you know, in between and hang out. But, I'll tell you what, the truth always comes out.

<sup>5</sup> The United States Supreme Court has stated that “[f]idelity to the doctrine announced in Miranda requires that it be enforced strictly, but only in those types of situations in which the concerns that powered the decision are implicated.” Berkemer v McCarty, 468 US 420, 437; 104 S Ct 3138; 82 L Ed 2d 317 (1984). These concerns involved the impairment of a defendant’s “free exercise of his privilege against self-incrimination.” Id. This statement from defendant actually exercising that privilege shows that, although the interview took place at a police station, defendant did not appear to believe that “questioning [would] continue until he provide[d] his interrogators the answers they seek.” Id. at 438.

<sup>6</sup> Sergeant Hall was not present for the earlier portion of the interview, but entered the interview room to sit with defendant while Detective Hinkley stepped out of the room to speak to Detective Gandy.

MR. BARRITT: Um-hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: You know what I mean? So, I guess it's one of those things if you - the sooner the truth comes out, the easier it is to - to deal with, you know what I mean?

MR. BARRITT: Um-hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: So, that's why it's really important. Sometimes people go all hardcore and whatever, and they - they wait until the very last second and it kind of makes 'em look really bad. So, it's best to - best to - to, I don't know, I guess you just want to make sure that - you seem like a really nice guy. You want to make sure that you're as truthful as possible because - because you know, it's going to be rough otherwise. You see what I mean?

MR. BARRITT: Um-hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: So, I don't know, that's just the only advice that I can give ya. It's always, always - it's always, always, no matter what situation you're in, it's always best to tell the truth. It's hard to stick with a lie.

MR. BARRITT: Um- hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: And then a lot of things, you know what I mean, when they're in here - when they're in here talking to you, they - they know the answer to 75 percent of the questions they ask.

MR. BARRITT: Um-hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: So, then they're kind of judging - judging your truthfulness or things that they can verify.

MR. BARRITT: Um-hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: So - and if you're being truthful, you got nothing to worry about. If not, then you - I don't know, you got something else you need to say, you probably ought - probably ought to get it out.

MR. BARRITT: Um-hum.

SERGEANT BRAD: Okay? So, there's only one way to straighten these things out, you know? So . . .

At the 87:25 mark (page 87) of the interview, Detective Gandy re-entered the room, and the following colloquy ensued:

DETECTIVE GANDY: All right. Well, we got a phone call from Mt. Morris PD. And they want to talk to you.

MR. BARRITT: Okay.

DETECTIVE GANDY: All right?

MR. BARRITT: Yup.

DETECTIVE GANDY: You are - we're going to meet Mt. Morris PD.

MR. BARRITT: All right. Where?

DETECTIVE GANDY: 94 near - and you're going to go with them.

MR. BARRITT: All right.

SERGEANT BRAD: Listen, John, before you go, is there anything else that you want to tell 'em? We talked for a second. I know you got something else there. I can see it written all over your face.

MR. BARRITT: No.

SERGEANT BRAD: You can't stick with it forever, bud. You can't even say it.

MR. BARRITT: I don't know what more to say.

SERGEANT BRAD: Just got to say - say the truth. Say what happened.

MR. BARRITT: I don't know what happened.

SERGEANT BRAD: Okay.

At that point, defendant was handcuffed<sup>7</sup> for purposes of transporting him to the Mt. Morris police for further questioning.

The record thus reflects that defendant's references to a need for counsel were equivocal, that defendant did not request that the interview end, and that defendant in fact indicated that he did not wish for the interview to end if it would hurt Wienski. And, in any event, other than Detective Hinkley asking defendant what had happened (in the context of Detective Hinkley's expressed belief that defendant knew more than he was saying) and Sergeant Hall later advising defendant to tell the truth and asking defendant whether there was anything else he wanted to say, officers did not "continue to question" defendant. Rather, the interview ended.<sup>8</sup>

<sup>7</sup> Detective Gandy stated, "we can't transport you without being restrained, for safety reasons."

<sup>8</sup> In any event, the prosecution asserts that "[t]he People do not seek to admit any statements made by Defendant after the point that defendant was restrained or at which he asserted his rights to cease questioning or to have an attorney present. Nonetheless, the statements made by

With regard to the presence or absence of physical restraints during the questioning, the trial court properly found that “the lack of handcuffs and unlocked doors weigh toward a finding that Defendant was not in custody.” However, the court went beyond the contours of the factor itself to reiterate its view that defendant had been “required” to ride in the police vehicle, that he was “escorted” into the station “by armed officers,” that during the interview he was always “in the presence of at least one armed officer,” that the interview became “heated,” and that the police officers had used a police dog as a coercive tactic. The trial court therefore concluded that “[w]hile not technically a physical restraint, there was an obvious threat of force employed by the officers,” and that it was reasonable to believe that “the purpose of this threat of force was to discourage Defendant’s movement and force him to talk.” For the reasons already described, I disagree with those characterizations, and therefore with the trial court’s employment of them in assessing the “physical restraint” factor.

Finally, the trial court accurately notes that after the interview, “Defendant was handcuffed and transported to the Mt. Morris Police Department where he was formally arrested.” And indeed, whether an interviewee is released at the end of the questioning is considered under the caselaw to be one of the factors to consider in assessing whether the interviewee was “in custody.” See, e.g., Howes, 565 US at 509; Yarborough, 541 US at 664. However, I agree with our concurring colleague in this Court’s first review of this case that this factor “seems somewhat anomalous, as it does not touch on the events of the interrogation itself.” See Barritt, 318 Mich App at 683-684 (GLEICHER, J., concurring), citing Pettinato, The Custody Catch–22: Post–Interrogation Release as a Factor in Determining Miranda Custody, 65 Ark. L. Rev. 799, 818 (2012) (“One oddity that has resulted from the general lack of clarity in Miranda custody jurisprudence is the consideration of post-interrogation arrest or release in the totality-of-the-circumstances test.”). I also do not believe that the mere fact that an interviewee is not released after initial questioning (so that the questioning may continue in another jurisdiction) should override the noncustodial nature of the initial questioning.

For all of these reasons, and viewing the entirety of the record, I conclude that in light of all of the objective circumstances surrounding defendant’s interrogation, a reasonable person would not have felt that he was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave. Barritt, 501 Mich at 872. Moreover, I conclude that the environment surrounding the interrogation did not present the same inherently coercive pressures as the type of station house questioning involved in Miranda. Id.

Accordingly, I would reverse the trial court’s order granting defendant’s motion to suppress.
