Explanation:

While the Family Law Section understands the tragic circumstances leading to the introduction of HB 4653 and SB 371, the Section has concerns over the broad nature of the bill. The bill cites several statutes, the violations of which would land a person on the child abuse offender database, but also states "or a substantially similar offense under a law of the United States, any state, or any country under tribal or military law." This created concerns about the broad and ambiguous nature of the bill. Who determines if a law is "substantially similar", and how is that determination made? Also, there was very little in the bill regarding how an individual can have their name removed, other than by a determination of the state police that the individual no longer needs to be listed on the database. No criteria or process is spelled out in the bill for the state police to make such a determination. This created concerns over errors or mistaken identity, among other reasons.
