Before: BORRELLO, P.J., and FITZGERALD and OWENS, JJ.

PER CURIAM.

Respondents/appellants Christine Ann Dudley-Marling, Ian Dudley-Marling, and Anne Dudley-Marling appeal as of right a December 5, 2011 probate court order wherein the court held that certain handwritten notes constituted both a valid amendment to the Gwendoline Louise Stillwell Trust (“Trust”), and a list governing the disposition of the settlor’s personal property, and held that Avery McPhail was a grandchild-beneficiary of the Trust. For the reasons set forth in this opinion, we affirm the probate court’s order in part and reverse the order in part.

I. FACTS & PROCEDURAL HISTORY

During her lifetime, the settlor, Gwendoline Stillwell had two children, Mary McPhail and Christine Dudley-Marling. Mary married appellee/petitioner-trustee David McPhail. Together, Mary and petitioner had three children, David Maxwell McPhail, Jacob McPhail and Dessa McPhail, and one grandchild, Avery McPhail (daughter of Dessa). Christine also had two children, Ian Dudley-Marling and Anne Dudley-Marling.

On July 16, 2001, Stillwell executed the Trust, a revocable trust. Stillwell conveyed all of her property, excluding joint accounts, into the Trust. The Trust provided that, upon Stillwell's death, "my children and grandchildren (including future born or adopted grandchildren) are the beneficiaries of this Trust." The Trust contained specific provisions regarding the distribution of real property, and it provided for the distribution of personal property pursuant to a written list that would be prepared and signed by Stillwell. The Trust provided that any remaining property would be distributed in equal shares to the beneficiaries. Finally, the Trust contained a clause that provided: "[t]he Grantor may by instrument in writing delivered to the Trustee . . . modify or alter this Agreement in any manner. . . ."

Stillwell died in May 2010. Sometime before her death, Stillwell instructed her grandson Jacob, age 27, that he was to take a large envelope to petitioner-trustee if anything ever happened to her. The envelope was addressed to petitioner, and stated "[i]n the event of my death [or] if I happen to become incapacitated so that living alone is futile, open this envelop [sic]. There in [sic] lies a summary of my estate and instructions." The envelope contained several pages of handwritten notes in sequential order with the most recent document on top. The notes were unsigned, but were dated. Many of the writings included lists and descriptions of personal property; however, Stillwell made several entries that were inconsistent with the terms of the Trust. Specifically, Stillwell instructed that petitioner was to share in the distribution of her personal property, and that both Jacob and Dessa's college tuition was to be paid from the estate before the estate was distributed to the beneficiaries.

On August 17, 2011, petitioner petitioned the probate court to construe the Trust in light of Stillwell's notes and determine the effect the notes had on the disposition of the assets in the Trust. In addition, at a hearing, petitioner indicated that he and Mary had adopted Avery (daughter of Dessa) six days after Stillwell's death. Petitioner argued that the adoption made Avery one of Stillwell's grandchildren, entitling her to a share of the estate. Respondents objected, arguing that the notes had no impact on the distribution of the estate because they were unsigned and did not reference the Trust or contain the word "amendment." Respondents also argued that Avery was not a beneficiary of the Trust because she was not a member of the grandchildren class of beneficiaries at the time of Stillwell's death.

Following an evidentiary hearing, the probate court entered an opinion and order on December 5, 2011, wherein the court held that the handwritten notes constituted both a valid amendment to the Trust and a list governing the disposition of Stillwell's personal property. The court concluded that, pursuant to the handwritten notes, petitioner was to share in the distribution of personal property and that Jacob and Dessa's student loans (approximately $76,244) were to be paid in full from the Trust assets before the remainder was distributed to the beneficiaries. Finally, the probate court concluded that Avery was a beneficiary of the Trust where the Fourth Paragraph of the Trust provided that "grandchildren" beneficiaries included "future born and adopted grandchildren." This appeal ensued.

II. ANALYSIS

Respondents raise two issues on appeal. Respondents contend that the handwritten notes did not have any lawful effect on the distribution of the Trust estate because they were unsigned and did not contain the word “amendment.” Respondents also contend that the probate court erred in holding that Avery was a beneficiary of the Trust.

We review de novo a probate court’s construction and interpretation of the language used in a will or a trust. In re Reisman Estate, 266 Mich App 522, 526; 702 NW2d 658 (2005). When construing a trust, “a court’s sole objective is to ascertain and give effect to the intent of the settlor.” In re Kostin Estate, 278 Mich App 47, 53; 748 NW2d 583 (2008). Absent ambiguity, the words of the trust document itself are the most indicative of the meaning and operation of the trust. Id. A probate court’s factual findings are reviewed for clear error. In re Raymond Estate, 482 Mich 48, 52-53; 746 NW2d 1 (2009).

With respect to amendment of a trust, the Estates and Protected Individuals Code (EPIC), MCL 700.1101, et seq., governs the application of a trust in Michigan. In re Temple Marital Trust, 278 Mich App 122, 127-128; 748 NW2d 265 (2008). MCL 700.7602(3)(a) provides that a settlor may amend a written revocable trust agreement “[b]y substantially complying with a method provided in the terms of the trust.”

In this case, the Ninth Paragraph of the Trust governed amendment and it provided that, “[t]he Grantor may by instrument in writing delivered to the Trustee . . . modify or alter this agreement in any manner . . .” (emphasis added). The paragraph did not require a signature. There is no dispute that Stillwell had the mental capacity to amend the Trust and there is no evidence of undue influence. Further, there is no dispute that the notes are in Stillwell’s handwriting. Essentially, at issue is whether the lack of a signature and absence of the word “amendment” are fatal to Stillwell’s attempt to alter the disposition of her estate. A review of the contested notes shows that, although the notes were unsigned and were not entitled an “amendment,” Stillwell nevertheless clearly intended to create a list disposing of her personal property and intended to amend the Trust.

Here, Stillwell placed the notes inside a large envelope that had specific directions to the successor trustee regarding her entire estate, indicating that she intended the documents to constitute more than just a list disposing of her personal property. In particular, Stillwell referred to the notes as “a summary of my estate and instructions,” and she summarized her entire estate on the outside of the envelope to include real property, gold, bank accounts and stocks. In the notes, Stillwell again referenced not only personal property, but also all of her assets. Stillwell clearly evinced her intent that the contents of the notes constitute her final directive on the distribution of her entire estate. For example, Stillwell directed how her real property should be distributed in the event that any of her heirs lived with her and provided care. She directed the successor trustee to divide all of her assets. In one entry, she stated, “given my age, however, all property must be up to date. Some stipulations are in order.” On April 17, 2010, Stillwell stated, “my latest directions are as follows” and then dictated how she wanted her assets to be divided. In addition, on October 4, 2009, she stated, “this is my latest directive to the family.”

Moreover, Stillwell modified how her assets were to be distributed. In the Trust, apart from specific instructions with respect to her real property, Stillwell directed that her assets be divided evenly among the beneficiaries. In contrast, in the notes, Stillwell clearly indicated that Jacob and Dessa’s college tuition was to first be paid before any other distribution of her assets. Specifically, on November 3, 2010, Stillwell made two written entries that read as follows:

When the assets are assembled and before dividing begins pay all college debts for Jake McPhail and Dessa McPhail.

Dessa McPhail and Jake McPhail's college loans must be paid ahead of any divisions of the estate.

These entries clearly show that Stillwell intended to alter the disposition of the Trust assets by providing that both Jacob and Dessa's tuition would be paid before any other distribution.

Furthermore, Stillwell modified the distribution of her personal property. In the Trust, Stillwell provided that her personal items were to be distributed to the beneficiaries. In the notes, Stillwell indicated that she wanted petitioner to share in the distribution of her personal property. Specifically, on November 3, 2010, Stillwell wrote, "give all heirs and include David N. McPhail the opportunity to choose personal items . . ." and "David N. McPhail is to be included in the divisions of personal items . . ." Near the last entry, Stillwell included an asterisk in the margin and wrote, "change from previous." On October 4, 2009, Stillwell referenced her personal possessions and wrote: "I wish all of the heirs to choose as they wish" and in the margin on the same page she drew an arrow to that sentence and wrote "[a]lso include David N. McPhail as he was a wonderful soninlaw [sic]."

In sum, Stillwell substantially complied with the terms of the Trust that governed an amendment when she drafted the handwritten notes and ensured that they were delivered to the successor trustee upon her incapacitation. MCL 700.7602(3)(a). Accordingly, the probate court properly held that the notes constituted an amendment to the Trust such that Jacob and Dessa's tuition should be paid from the assets of the Trust and that petitioner should participate in the distribution of personal property.

In addition, we find that the notes govern the disposition of Stillwell's personal property. The Trust provided that Stillwell either prepared or would prepare a signed written list designating certain personal property to certain persons. Here, although the handwritten notes were unsigned, aside from an amendment discussed above, the crux of the notes was to dispose of personal belongings. In the notes, Stillwell clearly evinced her intent to distribute her personal property in accord with her directives therein. Moreover, the signature requirement was to ensure validity of the document; here, no one questioned the validity of the notes. It is undisputed that the notes were in Stillwell's handwriting, that Stillwell included the notes in an envelope with instructions to the successor trustee, and that Stillwell had the notes delivered to the successor trustee upon her incapacitation. In taking these steps, Stillwell clearly evinced her intent that the notes constitute a final list governing the distribution of her personal property. Furthermore, Stillwell arguably satisfied the signature requirement where the notes were in Stillwell's own handwriting, and she made identifying statements about herself regarding her health and wellbeing. In sum, the probate court did not err when it ordered petitioner to distribute the personal property in accord with the directives in the handwritten notes.

Next, respondents contend that the probate court erred in concluding that Avery was a beneficiary of the Trust. The Fourth Paragraph of the Trust was entitled “Provisions Applicable Upon Death of Grantor,” and it provided in relevant part as follows:

A. Beneficiaries upon Death of Grantor.

2. I have only two children: Mary Denise McPhail and Christine Ann Dudley-Marling. I have five grandchildren: David Maxwell McPhail, Jacob Preston McPhail, Dessa Rose McPhail, Ann Dudley-Marling, and Ian Dudley-Marling.

3. It is my intent . . . that my children and grandchildren (including future born or adopted grandchildren) are the beneficiaries of this Trust. After my death if the Trustee makes any distributions . . . they shall be in equal portions, per capita, to all of my grandchildren and children. [Emphasis in original.]

Petitioner contends that Avery is a beneficiary of the Trust because she became Stillwell’s “grandchild” when, six days after Stillwell’s death, petitioner and Mary adopted Avery. Respondents counter that Avery was not a class member at the time of Stillwell’s death.

The language of the Trust shows that Stillwell created a class gift to her grandchildren. Absent clear indication to the contrary, generally, membership in a class is to be ascertained at the death of the testator. In re Fitzpatrick Estate, 159 Mich App 120, 128; 406 NW2d 483 (1987)¹; Veaser v Stenglein, 314 Mich 29, 35; 22 NW2d 59 (1946); In re Churchill’s Estate, 230 Mich 148, 158-159; 230 NW 118 (1925). See In re Reisman Estate, 266 Mich App at 527 (general rules of construction applicable to wills also apply to trusts).

Here, the plain language of the Trust shows that Stillwell intended her estate to vest and the class of grandchildren-beneficiaries to close at her death. In particular, the Fourth Paragraph of the Trust, is entitled “Provisions Applicable Upon Death of Grantor” (emphasis added). The paragraph subsequently identifies beneficiaries of the Trust in a clause that contains the header, “Beneficiaries Upon Death of Grantor” (emphasis added). Moreover, although the Trust defined “grandchild” to include “future-born and adopted grandchildren,” that definition did not change the fact that the class closed at Stillwell’s death. Instead, the definition was in place so that in the event Stillwell had additional grandchildren during her lifetime, they would also be included as beneficiaries with the other named grandchildren. In sum, Stillwell’s estate vested and the class of beneficiaries closed at her death. Accordingly, given that Avery was not Stillwell’s grandchild at that time, she was not a class member and is not entitled to a share of the estate; the probate court erred in concluding otherwise.

For the reasons set forth in this opinion, the probate court's order is affirmed in part and reversed in part. We do not retain jurisdiction. Both parties having presented valid arguments on appeal, neither party may tax costs. MCR 7.219(A).
