The public defense system in Michigan is broken and needs "systemic reform," Kristin Vandenberg told MCBA members at a 10 October lunch meeting at the downtown Holiday Inn.

At the time of Gideon v Wainwright (1963), Michigan was at the forefront of criminal defense, said Vandenberg, of the Michigan Campaign for Justice. Today, every county sets its own rules and budgets. As a result, "which side of the county line determines the type of justice" that results, she said.

Because Michigan has no standardized statewide system it is difficult to determine the best way to discover the extent of the problem or possible repairs, she said. A study now is under way to provide information to lawmakers concerning the scope of the problem.

The Michigan Coalition for Justice – a related organization – filed suit this year against the State of Michigan regarding criminal defense issues. Muskegon is one of three counties identified as deficient by the lawsuit but the county is not a party to the litigation.

"The lawsuit is not directed at lawyers, but at [the state]," Ms. Vandenberg said. "It recognizes most criminal defense attorneys do their best to give good representation to their clients."

Patricia Steele, 14th Circuit Court administrator, asked several pointed questions regarding funding.

Public Defense Issue, Con't

Acknowledging Michigan is hard-pressed for money, Ms. Vandenberg said defense reform will save money in the long-run. Money spent now will result in fewer and shorter prison terms, she said.

Local reaction varied from support for change to the cynical: "Isn't this another way to send our money to Detroit?"
